What is the difference between a bracket and a beam anchor?

Brackets have a hinge that allows the system to sway during seismic activity. Lower brackets connect threaded rod to the lower end of the strut or pipe. They have a hinge that allows the system to sway during seismic activity. Beam anchors allow you to mount upper brackets to beams, C- channel, ceiling joists, and other flat surfaces.

Are seismic braces putting fire sprinkler systems at risk?

In fact, traditional seismic braces available on the market may be putting fire sprinkler systems at risk of failure, rather than safeguarding them as intended. Yet with properly designed seismic bracing, CPVC can be confidently deployed in applications across the industry.

What is a beam anchor & angle iron anchor?

Beam anchors allow you to mount upper brackets to beams, C- channel, ceiling joists, and other flat surfaces. Their set screws have heads that break off when the screw is tightened to ensure proper installation. Angle iron anchors allow you to mount upper brackets to pairs of angles, such as those used in ceiling joists.
